EAST ASIAN EXPORTS TO THE UNITED STATES

The bulk of exports to the United States from developing East Asian countries -- South Korea, Taiwan and Hong Kong -- consists of light industry consumer-oriented products. These countries, which lack a heavy industrial base, are essentially processing centers where raw materials and semi-manufactured goods are assembled or otherwise processed into finished products. Textiles and clothing are their traditional leading export, and the United States is a major market for these products. However, electronic products and electrical appliances are among their fastest-growing new leading export lines, and in the case of Taiwan have surpassed textiles and apparel sales to the United States.

Plywood, footwear and wigs are other important South Korean exports to the United States, while footwear, processed fruits and vegetables, and light transport equipment, such as bicycles, are among Taiwan's principal exports to this country. In the case of Hong Kong, traditional export products, such as toys, travel goods, jewelry and decorative articles, remain important, but electronic parts and products now also account for a substantial share of sales to the United States.
